It is known that Debussy created his symphonic prelude L'Après Midi D'un Faun (The Afternoon of a Faun) under the impression of the eklogue by Stephane Mallarme. Mallarme is considered one of the most difficult French symbolist poets to understand. His Faun character is very complicated and contradictory. It is a gentle and luxury of the midday heat in it, along with the high stress, inner conflicts and animal passions, which is connected with the shrill longing for the nymph Syrinx, that special person who did not allow him to catch it, but turned into a flute in his hands. The gross impudence of the ambitious amateur, who is always ready to challenge gods, combines with the gentle and sincere innocence of his flute melodies. It is easy to assume that the musical image of Faun is no less complicated than the literary one, taking into account The Letter from Mallarme to Debussy, in which the poet recognizes: her illustration of the afternoon of a faun offers no slight dissonance with my text, except that it goes on, really, in nostalgia and light, with finesse, discomfort and richness. In my transcription, I did my best to present Debussy's symphonic masterpiece as a composition for piano. I have tried to free a pianist from the need to imitate an orchestra, otherwise it would be nothing more than a pale shadow of the rich palette of orchestral colors that debussy used so masterfully. And yet the most important thing I would like to draw the attention of an interpreter, not tonal colors and orchestral colors, nor his painters, but the nuances of the psychological states of that mythological creature whose passions are so astonishingly human.
